Excerpt from Gmis: An Experimental System for Data Management and Analysis How many people would climb aboard a trans-atlantic flight if they thought the airline lacked the capability to process volumes of weather and traffic data, and to plan a safe route? Not many, for most of us have come to expect that the very best information processing services will be applied in this circumstance. Yet public policymakers and corporate executives are regularly faced with far more complex and serious problems (perhaps with risks that are less immediate and obvious), and must make decisions without the capacity to manage and analyze the pertinent information. This happens for several reasons: Circumstances arise unexpectedly, and under current technology there simply is not time to construct the necessary software, or decisions may not occur regularly enough to justify the cost of a normal information management system, particularly when its useful life may be cut short by changing circumstances. In this paper we report on an effort to design and implement tools appropriate to this circumstance. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
