Excerpt from Beginnings of the Classical Heroic Couplet in England, Vol. 47 But in all this discussion, the theory and the assertions cited above were either not mentioned at all, or were dealt with in a summary and uncritical fashion. The Quarterly Reviewer actually rejects as not practical the question of the influence of Continental literature upon that of England. His reason is, partly, because English literature can never be studied properly, unless it be studied in connection with the literature of Greece and Rome, but chiefly, because it is not to be expected that a student should read, in addition to Greek and Latin, half-a-dozen other languages, and among those languages Anglo-Saxon and German (p. It is difficult to understand Mr. Collins' position in regard to the classical couplet. He does not appear to recognize the existence of that metrical form as distinguished from the Elizabethan rhymed couplet. An instance of the rashness of his statements is this, that George Sandys wrote heroic couplets simply indistinguishable from Pope's couplets (p. This is literary criticism by and large. We shall see below that Sandys' couplets are simply and easily distinguishable from those of Pope. The discussion aroused by the Quarterly Review article produced absolutely no critical result. And now, in 1889, in A History of Eighteenth Century Literature (London and New York), Mr. Gosse enters the field again with a series of statements, chastened in form, but with unabated clearness and pretension.
